WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

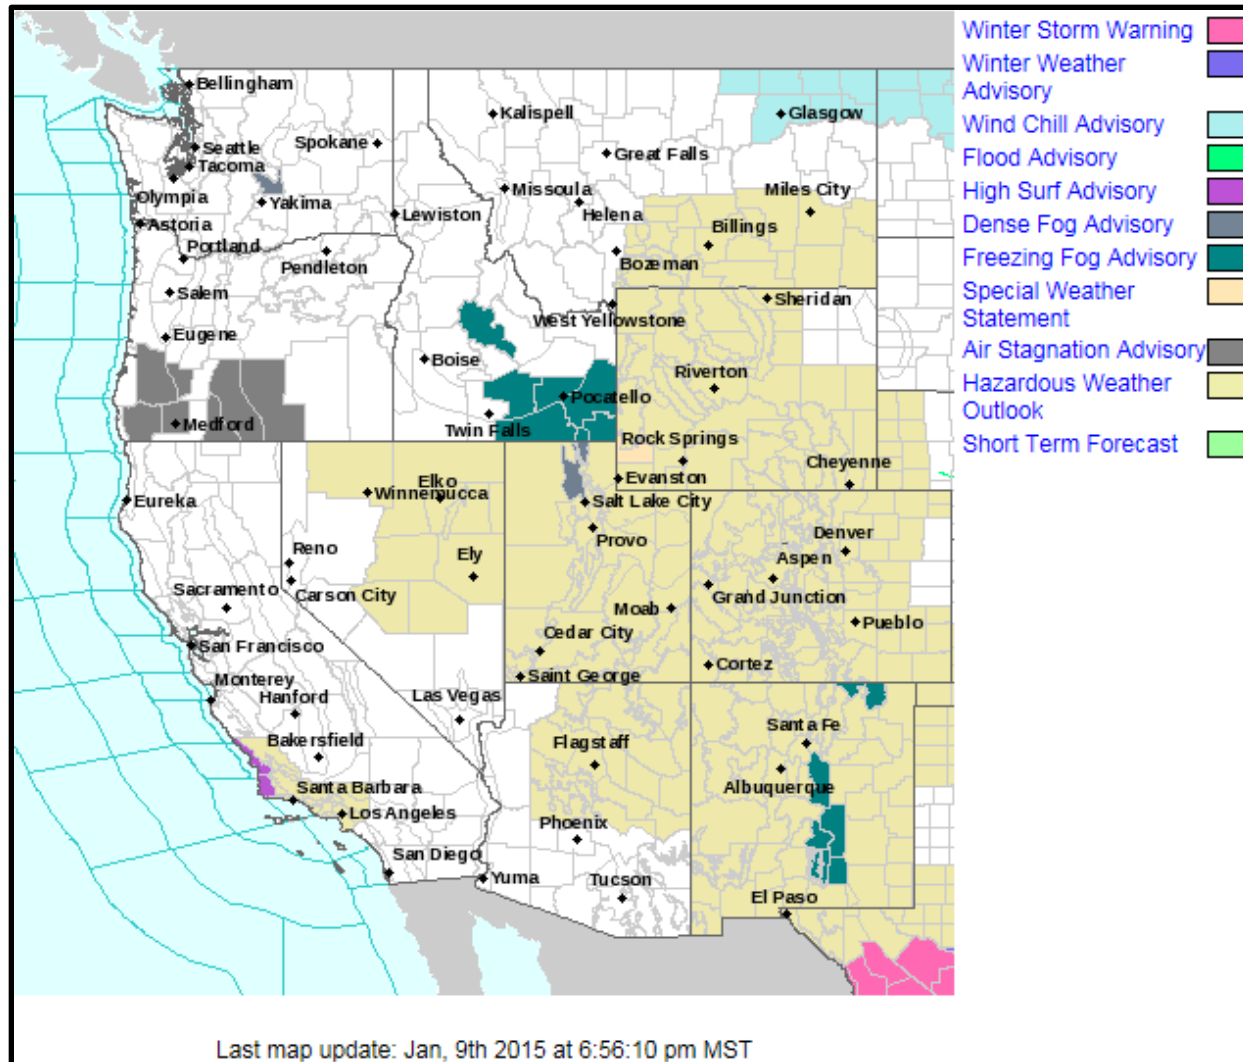

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

A series of weak low pressure troughs will move through the Northern Operational Region between now and Monday producing plenty of cloud cover with high humidity. Temperatures will return to near normal this weekend. A few light rain showers are possible over the higher terrain late today and tonight with the first trough, but wetting rain is not expected anywhere. A second trough late Saturday may produce a few more showers, but amounts will be similar to the first trough. A third system late Sunday into Monday will produce up to 0.50 inches in the northern mountains and around 0.10 inches in northern valleys. Snow levels will drop to around 5000 feet Sunday night. Areas farther south will get little to no precipitation. High pressure will build in late Monday and remain over California much of the week. A drying and warming trend will take place and north-east/offshore surface winds will enhance the dry and warm conditions. Computer models still show a chance of a wet weather system moving onshore next Friday.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

A weak trough will bring cool, cloudy weather to the region over the weekend along with scattered light showers. Today, scattered light showers will continue across portions of San Bernardino National Forest southward into San Diego County through the late morning hours before ending by early afternoon. Additional showers will be possible in the Sierras north of Fresno County. Rainfall amounts will range from a trace to a tenth of an inch across all areas with under two inches of snow expected in the Sierras. Elsewhere, cloudy skies and onshore flow will result in much cooler weather through Sunday. Highs will be back to near seasonal averages through the weekend with highs in the 40s in the mountains to the upper 60s to lower 70s across the inland valleys of Southern California. After a rain-free Friday night through Saturday afternoon, a secondary impulse will promote additional showers Saturday evening through Sunday across Southern California from San Luis Obispo and Kern County southward. Up to a half of an inch of rainfall will be possible with the highest amounts likely across the south and southwest aspects of the Angeles and San Bernardino National Forest. The snow level will remain above 6,000 feet. Next week, warmer and drier weather is expected as high pressure builds off the coast. As the trough departs the region, gusty north winds may be possible across the I-5 Corridor and Cajon Pass next Monday night into Tuesday morning. The winds may transition to an east and northeast offshore direction next Wednesday through Friday. Overall, expect dry weather next week, but a wetter weather pattern may ensue during the third week of the month.
